As noted above, Mill claims not only that enumerative induction is a valid principle, but that it is the sole principle by which we are justified in inferring unobserved facts about the world. He was also one of the last major world thinkers to write on nearly every philosophical topic, ranging from logic to religion. PoliticalPhilosophyandJohnStuartEssay. Although it is true that our character and desires, in combination with a set of circumstances, causally necessitates some particular action, it is not true that if that person had some alternative character and set of desires that that same cause would necessitate that same action.
